PRIORITY CODE PAD2013

America's Maritime Industry

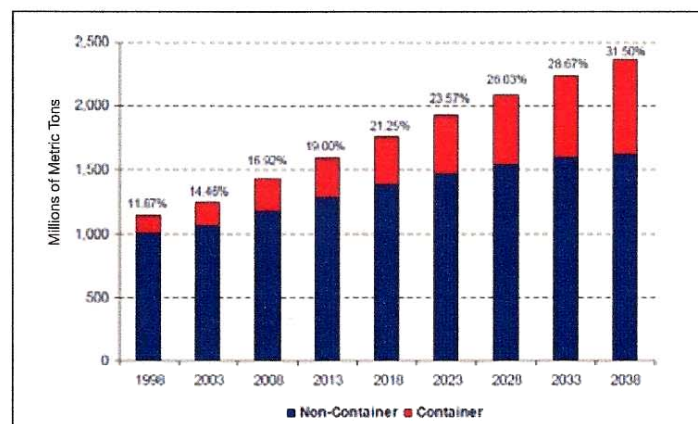

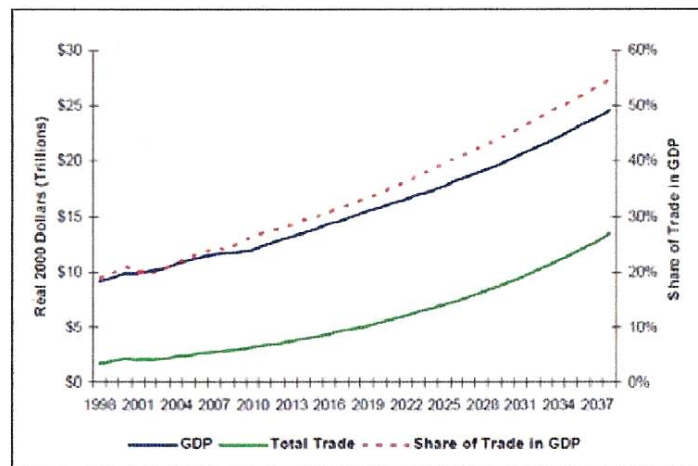

The foundation of American seapower.

With 95% of our foreign trade moving by ship, the role of maritime transportation will continue to increase. In 2009, for example, 6,996 oceangoing vessels made 55,560 calls at U.S. ports transporting 1.2 billion metric tons of U.S. imports and exports with a combined value in excess of 1 trillion U.S. dollars. On average, that equates to over 180 oceangoing vessels calling at U.S. ports every day.⁴

It is projected that the maritime share of U.S. trade as measured by TEU's (20-foot Container Equivalent Units) will double by 2023 to about 45 million TEU's and increase to 75 million TEU's (about 2.4 billion tons) by 2038. Trade by sea will grow even faster by value, rising from about $1.8 trillion in 2008 and to about $10.5 trillion in 2038. Thus, over the next 30 years, trade will increase by an average annual growth rate of 1.9% by volume and 6.4% by nominal value. These growth rates reveal that the U.S. will be trading in goods of higher value per ton and highlight yet again the increasing importance of maritime trade to the U.S. economy and national wealth creation.⁵

Overall, when trade-dependent jobs are included in the analysis, it is estimated that maritime industry related employment represents approximately 13 million U.S. jobs.⁶
